out for their reception by the nobleman who knelt before him. Then the dressing gown of cloth of gold was carefully wrapped around his rotund form, and with another yawn or two his highness shulled across the room and disappeared through the door by which his attendants had just entered. Ho was preceded thither by Mme. Campan, who when he had passed through it boited it carefully. She then threw back the shutters from the great square window, admitting a flood of light into the apartment, after which she pulled back the curtains of the bed on the side opposite to that from which the king had descended, and left the room, which was immediately entered by a crowd of ladies of honor, headed by the Princess de Lamballe, who proceeded to assist her majesty in making the tone of the lood, must have then been exceedingly beautiful with a face perfectly oval, large liquid eyes, and a bountiful supply of silky hair. Brought up in the almost demo-cratically simple court of Maria Theresa, the ten years she had since spent first as Dauphiness, and then as Queen of France, had not habituated her to the burdensome etiquette or the most cere-monious court in Europe, and so her lovely face was clouded with an air of only half concealed wearness and dis-dain, as she underwent the tedium of dressing. Throughout this longthly process nothing was handed to her di-rectly, even her gloyes being placed on a long golden salver called a gautiere. Before the tollet, however, she had taken her bath (suc bathed in a long gown of English flannel, buttoned down to the hem and lined throughout with linen), dressed anew in a lace-trimmed gown of English flannel, buttoned: "Gown to the hem and lined throughout with linen), dressed anew in a lace-trimmed chemise and a white taffety bedgown, and repaired once more to bed, where the Princess de Lamballe had presented her with a simple breakfast of chocolate and fine rolls. Here she lay until noon, when the room was filled with noblemen, ecclesiastics, ladies of the court, and officers of the guard, for the grand toliette was to take place and this was the time appointed for all high in rank to pay their respects. These she saluted according to their rank, a smile to one, a nod to another, and a stately inclination to a third, until at last the dressing of the enormous pyramid of hair was concluded, and she withdrew into her closet to complete her toliet. Emerging thence, she was escorted to the chapel, where the king, who had in his turn gone through almost as ceremonious an attiring, was already present, and facing the grand altar the husband and wife heard mass. Returning she passed into the "cabinet of the nobility," a room leading to her own chamber, and the maitre d'hotel, a dignified personage, furnished with a staff some seven feet in length, having announced that the "queen was served," the royal pair "queen was served."

Infinite with a star some seven lett in length, having announced that the "queen was served," the royal pair tiveness are many and serious; but the dined, the table service being performed by the lady of honor and four noblewomen in full dress. Then, the meal being over, the queen retired to her apartment, was diversed of her hoop and train, and for the first time that day considerable according to the constant of the first time that day considerable according to the constant of the first time that day considerable according to the constant of the first time that day considerable according to the constant of the co found herself a woman, and not simply a queen.

It was now growing dusk, and the queen, dressed in a simple costume of white muslin, had received a visit from her two-year-old daughter, who was brought in by her nives and tutors, and had played with and fondled the child as though she were the humblest mother in her dominions. She was now nominally working with idly taken stichnes on a little square of tapestry, but in reality listening with half-suppressed laughter to some story told her by the Comtesse of Polignac, with meaning abrugs and tell-tale sinking of the voice. Suddenly Mme. Campan entered the room and whispered to her majesty, who flushed crimson, hastily rose, and leaving the comtesse without a word, plassed into her private ploset followed by Mme. Campan.

"Has he come, good Campan, has he come?" she exclaimed with childish impetuosity as soon as the door was closed.

"He is here, your majesty," was the answer. "I simuggled him through in the guise of a captain of the guard, and here he is, I fancy." As she spok a small door in the corner of the apartment was opened and a sinister-looking man, to whom even the gorgeous uniform he wore could not give an air of breeding, entered the room.
"You have seat for me, your majesty," he said in a harsh voice, "and here I am. What is your will?"
"You are M. Mesmer, are you not?"
The visitor silently bowed. "We have heard of you and that you can look into the future and would make a test of your pretended powers," said the young queen disdainfully."
"My pretended powers, as your majesty is pleased to term them, have been valued by the king's government at 50, 000 francs, but they are at your service for naught."
The queen clapped her hands delightedly,
"That is charming," said she. "Now
